PARENTING IN A FAST-PACED ENVIRONMENT – LAGOS, NIGERIA

It is expected that parents should be competent enough to care for their children, regardless of their environment. However, in reality, society often fails to recognize the key factors that significantly influence this expectation.

- Parents are expected to anticipate and provide for their children's basic needs.
- They are expected to coordinate their children's academic journey to ensure success.
- They are expected to ensure their children participate in meaningful activities and have enriching experiences.
- They are expected to create a peaceful and harmonious home for the entire family.

These expectations place unrealistic pressure on parents and often result in chaotic and disorganized outcomes, especially since they are also expected to advance in their own careers and personal development.

Coordinating a child's journey to success is often seen as mandatory, regardless of the environment. However, this expectation leaves little room for the realities many parents face. No exceptions are made for those who work from Monday to Sunday, or who leave home as early as 5 a.m. just to arrive on time and avoid the heavy, ever-present traffic in a busy city like Lagos, Nigeria. Many return home late, long after their children have gone to bed.

For such families, weekends become the only opportunity for meaningful connection and reunion. Yet even this time is not guaranteed, as some parents' work schedules extend into weekends due to the demands of their careers.

In truth, parents who genuinely desire to be actively involved in raising their children often encounter significant obstacles and pressures,

Working parents in the fast-paced Lagos environment are expected to be actively involved in raising their children without compromising or sacrificing their career goals. In modern society, technology has made it easier for parents to stay connected with their children through smartphones, but this often leads to early exposure to social media.

This, in turn, presents its own challenges, as parents are required to monitor and regulate their children's activities online. Balancing career responsibilities with active parenting, while also managing the risks associated with digital exposure, places increasing pressure on today's working parents.

As a parent, you may not be available to participate in every activity your child does, both in school and at home. However, you can be present by ensuring that you remember every single activity and program that matters much to your child. Even if you are not there, let your actions augment your absence. For example, ensure you were involved with the planning and creation of costumes for recreational activities.

SOME KEY POINTS ON HOW TO BE PRESENT AS A PARENT

Be Intentional

A forward-thinking approach to family life means planning ahead for smoother, stress-free days. Parents can take the lead by organizing weekly meal plans for their children, ensuring lunches and dinners are ready in advance. One effective way is to dedicate time over the weekend to prepare and freeze meals. This not only saves time during busy weekdays but also guarantees that your family enjoys healthy, home-cooked meals every day.

In addition, preparing clothes, lunch packs, and snacks the night before helps to ensure that mornings are calm and stress-free. Older children can also be taught to take responsibility for these routines themselves, while parents occasionally assist younger ones as they learn.

Spend time with each child

I know this may sound challenging, especially considering that many parents in Lagos return home when their children are already asleep. However, where possible, try to dedicate just ten to fifteen minutes, three or four times a week, to do something your child enjoys. For those who can, it is essential to prioritize consistent quality time with your child.

Limit weekend social engagements, such as “Owanbe,” to only the most important occasions so that proper parenting time is preserved. Where possible, plan vacations to coincide with your children’s long school holidays, allowing for meaningful time together.

Filling your child's life with meaningful shared memories strengthens and deepens your bond with them. Without intentional time investment, the emotional bond may gradually weaken. Special time involves your full, undivided attention—100% of your presence.

Learn with Them

You may feel it is quite demanding, but learning alongside your child also helps to expand your own knowledge. When you learn together, concepts become clearer to your children, and they feel more secure through the presence and support of a parent.
However, it is important to be intentional in your choice of topics. Otherwise, you may find yourself constrained, and the child could become frustrated.

Be Present in Their Lives

Ask questions about your children's personal and school lives without being controlling. Take time to understand their hobbies, friendships, favorite TV shows, what excites them, as well as their likes, dislikes, and social media interests and activities.

Create an environment where they feel comfortable discussing their challenges and fears with you. Seek to understand their struggles and support them in finding ways to overcome them

Let Your Love "Show"

There is no yardstick for measuring the amount of love you owe your children. However, it is important to consistently show appreciation, reward their efforts, and celebrate their successes, no matter how small.

Express your love openly so they truly understand it; otherwise, they may misinterpret your silence and seek attention through negative behaviour or rebellion. When correcting them, do so gently and affirmatively. Help them understand why they are being reprimanded without making them feel defensive.

When children act out, try to understand the reasons behind their behaviour and calmly discuss both their actions and the consequences. Let your love be the guiding force that also teaches them how to show love and kindness to others.

Teach them Real-Life Experiences in the Technology Age

We live in a technology-driven world, where most of your children's leisure activities may be virtual—especially in a busy, traffic-laden city like Lagos, Nigeria. It's crucial to create time to teach them real-life experiences by guiding them through these activities yourself. Never give your children the impression that these experiences are outdated, unnecessary, or meant for only certain groups. This approach will help them truly appreciate the lifestyle you provide and understand the value of hard work and responsibility.

Involve them in household chores such as cooking, cleaning, and washing. Make no exceptions. When they learn these skills at a young age, they grow up to be responsible, independent, and less entitled.

Teach them the value of contribution—let them see that everyone plays a part in making a home run smoothly.
Show them that real-life skills are just as important as virtual ones. This balance prepares them for adulthood and fosters gratitude for the life you've built for them.

Parent by example

Your children are a reflection of you as a parent. More often than not, they grow up mirroring what they see you do, not just what they hear you say. If you want them to embrace certain values or behaviors, let them see you live by those same principles. For example, if you say you love to read, let them see you read—don't just talk about it.

Show them respect in every interaction. Even when they frustrate or annoy you, avoid reacting in ways that embarrass or belittle them. Instead, guide them back to a place of mutual respect with patience and understanding.

Never let pride stand in the way of doing what's right. If you've mistakenly accused or offended them, be humble enough to apologize. This teaches them accountability, humility, and the importance of repairing relationships—lessons that will stay with them for life.

Love yourself

It can feel overwhelming to think about everything you need to do as a parent. But remember, you must be intentional about caring for yourself—because you, too, are human and worthy of care. No one understands your needs and challenges as a parent better than you do.

Make time to relax and recharge - you deserve it. Nourish your body with healthy meals, prioritize restful sleep, stay active, and take pride in your appearance. Most importantly, do things you genuinely enjoy during your free time. Taking care of yourself isn't selfish; you have earned it as a parent.
